Nomadic people spend much of their lives traveling from place to place, bringing them closer to food sources, to friends and relatives, and to meaningful places. Archaeologists who study these mobile hunting and gathering groups are left with tangible evidence of these breaks in travel in the form of modest rock architecture – signs of encampments, vision quests, battles, and hunting strategies. Professor Scheiber will highlight recent work documenting these enigmatic features.